

The last queen of France

Marie Antoinette

Marie Antoinette was born on November 2, 1755, as an Archduchess of Austria. In 1770, as part of a diplomatic policy with France, she married the French Dauphin, the future Louis XVI, becoming the last queen in French history.

She loved luxury and indulged in hobbies such as fashion, architecture, and theater, living a glamorous life as a leader of her time. Due to this lifestyle, she was criticized as a spendthrift, even being called the "Madame Deficit." On the other hand, she made contributions by supporting the arts and French culture, helping with famine issues, and engaging in charitable activities for the poor.

However, at that time, such achievements were overshadowed by the era, circumstances, and her image, while the dissatisfaction of citizens struggling with poverty against the monarchy grew. As a result, she was executed in 1793 during the French Revolution.